Read & Draw: Arctic Travels

Canada's North (sometimes called the Arctic) is made up of three Territories, Yukon Territory, Northwest Territories and Nunavut Territory. These three Territories make up 40% (almost half) of Canada's landmass. Even though they are so large, few people live in the North because the weather conditions can be very harsh. Winters are cold and windy, making travel difficult.

Traditionally most people would travel, in groups of 50-100, following the seasons migrating they hunted for food. In the summer they would set up camps by building temporary tents (made of igloo) on the plains by the First Nations peoples). Summertime travel was much easier because the weather was milder. Summer temperatures average 10°C which is like a warm spring day here in Alberta. Oh land, people would often travel by foot, but they mostly took advantage of the nice weather to travel on the water by kayak or umiak hunting for

In the winter time, the most people would travel in large groups of about 100 people. They would build snow houses (also known as igloos) because they could be built quickly and this made it easy to travel and hunt migrating animals such as caribou and seals.

In present day Nunavut people live in stationary houses much like ours and might build on igloo when hunting in the winter. Planes, boats and automobiles are used to transport food and other goods necessary for survival. Igloo (the capital and only city in Nunavut) is very difficult to get to and it is very expensive to transport food there. Many people suffer with huge grasses bills and cannot read their families and the Nunavut food is very grateful for any donations.
